AFTER ASHBERRY
CHRISTOS KALLI

The self-portraits are fading on the sky and I turn to ask if you mistook the line of the poem for a light breeze. The night reveals its stripes, and to French the scene up you mutter a Quelles belles hanches the way the artists struggle to find words only to have the words strangle them.

The dialogue is becoming too suggestive for you to stay calm. The room too full of details for your eyes to stay on the restless clock. What makes the mirror a mirror is the object being reflected and its hairline. How it moves slightly with the eyebrows when you are shocked with the tenth symphony and with the colors of my Parisian scarf. Even dissatisfaction shows up, disguised as words, and then disguised as a young man thumbing his lips.

How he throws his wineglass at your face only to see the face in the mirror shutter up.
